Olivia Anderson is an incoming third-year law student at the University of Houston Law Center. A native Houstonian, she graduated summa cum laude from the University of Houston with a degree in journalism and is a graduate of the Kinder High School for the Performing and Visual Arts. Olivia is passionate about supporting the arts community in Houston by helping local artists protect their intellectual property rights and secure fair compensation for their work.

Olivia currently serves as a student attorney at UHLC's Entertainment Law Clinic, where she represents clients in the entertainment and art sectors, with a particular interest in trademark and copyright claims and registrations. Next semester, she will continue this work in the advanced Entertainment Law Clinic, where she also plans to lead educational outreach initiatives to introduce Houston-area students to intellectual property law.

Olivia previously worked as a legal intern for the general counsel of the Museum of Fine Arts, Houston, where she gained experience addressing intellectual property issues facing museums and nonprofit organizations. She is a member of the Museum and Cultural Heritage Law Society and is interested in exploring legal issues at the intersection of IP and cultural heritage law.

In addition to her clinical work, Olivia serves as Head Senior Articles Editor of the Houston Journal for Health Law and Policy and is a member of the Latinx Law Students Association. As a first-generation law student and a Mexican American woman in law, she is committed to promoting inclusion and diversity in the legal field and in IP law. Olivia intends to develop a career in IP law that has a positive impact on Texas's legal and creative communities.
